THE GIFT.

An April day-the sky all dappled with silver-shining clouds, while bright sheets of rain seemed to braid themselves with the sunbeams, and every gust of southwardcoming air seemed full of the vague scents of violets and daffedils, and grass growing on sunny hillsides.

Biram Lacy sat by his city window, where the sweet air lifted the silver hair upon his forehead, and thought longingly of the departed days when he dwelt under his own vine and fig-tree, and watched the dancing sunbeams with greedy eyes.

"Marian!" he said, in his feeble, piping voice. "Marian, don't you think we might have a little walk in the park this afternoon? The air is so mild-and I'm so tired of these four walls!"

Marian Lacy looked up from her desk, at the farther end of the room.

She was a slender, pretty girl, of seven or eight-and-twenty, with large, soft hazel eyes, brown hair and pale cheeks.

"By and by, dear father," she said gently.

"When the sun gets a little lower." And once more she eagerly resumed her writing, the pen flying swiftly over the smooth surface of the paper, as if it were winged with magic speed.

Hirsm Lacy turned to his wife, who sat patientry rewing opposite to him. "Wife," said he, "the apple trees will be in blessom soon at the old farm. Don't you remember how the white leaves used to shower down on the ground like a snow storm? The old farm-if I could have ended my days there," he added with a weary sigh. "Here I'm a poor, weakly old man, and nobody nurses me or cares for me in the city whirl-but there every tree is an old friend of mine, and the very wind among the branches sounds familiar."

"It's no use thinking about old times, dear," said his wife, sighing almost inaudi-

"If I could only have been contented to let those oil speculations alone," resumed Hiram, easerly, 'or if I could have bought them a month-enly a month-earlier! But I was mad-and we are ruined! The land. lord was bere this morning persecuting us because the rent of the rooms was not paid. I never thought I should come to this,

His wife made no reply. Marian still wrote on, her brow slightly contracted. "Still, we should have done well enough, went on poor old Lacy, "if Marian could have made up her mind to marry young Deforest. He is well off. We old folks could have had a home with him, with our feet on the green grass and God's pure, clear sky above our heads. It's not too late yet, lass. Deforest was here yesterday when you and mother were gone down to those musty old newspaper offices. You'd better think of it, my girl."

Marian looked up, tossing back the drooping hair from her brow.

"Father," she said, pitifully, "I have told you that I do not love him!" "Love! love!" echoed the old man, sneeringly. "Love won't boil the kettle nor buy a gown! I thought you had outgrown the age of school-girl sentiment!'

"I hope I shall never outgrow it, father!" answered Marian, in a low voice. "And while you are waiting for love to grow up in your heart your poor old father and mother may pine their lives out in this city smelling den!" "I hope not, father!" said Marian. "My writing-" "I don't want to hear another word of your writing," interrupted Mr. Lacy. "If it hadn't been for your ridiculous idea that you were a genius, you'd have settled down quietly to be John Deforest's wife five years

Marian pursued the argument no further, but her mother's gentle, encouraging glance, as she looked up, mutually testified that she had at least one tender sympa-

And the blue-eyed April violets blossomed and died, and May hung her chaplets of bloom on tree, and glen, and forest, and still Marian toiled on, early and late.

Her father's words often occurred to her at times of fatigue or despondency. "A genius." Was she indeed a genius? If she were-oh, bright, impossible if-every sacred fire of her pature was burning on the altar of this book, into which she was interweaving the tenderest funcies of soul or brain; oh, if !

And Marian grew paler and more absorbed day by day; and her mother watched her with wistful, silent care, and old Hiram tretted on, with the incoherent plaints of old age; and the summer ripened into golden fullness under beamy moonlight nights and the glow of tropic days.

"It's getting warm weather." grouped old Hiram, "and this croton water isn't fit for a dog to drink, let alone a Christian. Oh, if I could only have a drink of water out of the old well under the garden wall! It used to be cold as ice when the sun was at its hottest. I dreamed last night of standing beside that well, with the old backet brimming over, and the wild roses hanging over the curb, all in a tangle, as they used to grow!" "Father," said Mariar, who had just come in, with cheeks unwontedly rosy, and a light sparkling deep down in her eyes, "shall we atl go-you and I and reather, for a long drive in the country this afternoon?" The old man's face lighted up for an instant, but it fell again. "We can't afford it," he said, testily. "We

"But I have earned a-a little money from my book," began Marian, earnestly. "Book, indeed!" laughed old Hiram. "A pretty book you'd write. But we'll go if you can afford to squander the money on your old father. You've been very close with your money of late."

Marian's cheeks glowed at the undeserved 'Father's not well," she said to herself,
"and he's old and irritable, and this hot weather frets him. He will be better And here Marian's reverie stopped. The air was full of the sweet breath of new-mown bay, when the open carriage rolled along the green country roads, under the rustling boughs of elm and beech and waving willow. Hiram Lacy's eyes brightened-the blood seemed to leap with new impulses through his veins. "Ah!" he cried, drawing a deep breath, "row I am beginning to live again. Why, this is the old road, with the garland oak hanging over the gate. They are the fields that need to be ours! Daughter, why did you take this road?"

"I thought you would like to see the old place sgain, father."

"It isn't ours any longer!" he groaned. "See those clover fields—I always said it was the best ground in the country—and the tall corn growing so royally! And the house looks just as it used to look. I believe it's the very same robin singing in the poplar tree by the porch."

His eyes were brimming over with tearshis voice faitered strangely as he spoke. "Who lives there now?" he asked. "You said Burke had sold it!" "Nobody just at present Shall we go in and walk through the rooms?" Hiram Lacy assented with a silent inclination f the head. It was all the same-the old furniture undisturbed in its nooks and corners-the worn, familiar carpets—the same tinting of wall and woodwork. Hiram Lacy could almost believe that it was but yesterday he quitted the threshold. He sat down in the old cushioned arm-chair, which had once been his special chair. "I shall die more contentedly for having seen the dear old farm-house once more! he said, in a broken voice.

"Father!" cried Marian, unable to restrain herself any longer. "you shall never leave it. It is home to you!"

"Home!" repeated old Hiram, in a puzzled voice. "It was home once, I know, but

"And it is home now!" cried Marian. throwing her arms around his neck, and bursting into tears. "Tell him, mother! I

"Marian is the one who has bought it, father," said the old lady, with fond, ma-ternal pride. Her book has been published -and it was a great success-and she took the money to buy the farm back, for her father and mother to end their days in!"

Old Hiram was silent for an instant-then he said his hand on Marian's bowed head. "My daughter," he said, "you have kept the fourth commandment, and God will bless you for it in His own good time! I never dreamed of this, when-when I was so cross and unreasonable with you! But who is this?" as a shadow crossed the threshold, and a tall, noble looking man entered from another door. "One of our new neighbors, sice I left here."

"No, father!" said Marian, growing as rosy as the elm-pinks in the garden outside; "it's Mr. Arden, one of the publishers of the new

"I'm glad to see you, sir," said Hiram Lacy, with old-fashioned conrtesy, "and I'm glad you like my girl's writtings. "I do, sir, very much," said Mr. Arden, frankly, "and moreover I like the girl-so well that I am here this afternoon to ask you to give her to me for my wite ' "What does Marian say?' asked the old

Making His Relatives Sleep Over Coffins. but Willing His Property Away From Them.

Newsurg, March 22 .- John S. Sammons, an eccentric citizen of the town of Montgomery, six miles from this city, died in Dacember last, and left real and personal property valued at $11,000. He bequeathed the entire estate to the Montgomery M. E. Church, the income to be enjoyed by the church as long as it adheres to the doctrine of the M. E. Church of North America. A further condition is that the church officials shall keep his burial vault in good condition and have it visited at least once a month by a Trustee, who is to receive $1 for each visi-

The probate of the will is opposed by Sammon's relatives, who claimed that he was mentally incapable of making a will, and also upon the ground that it creates a per-

He kept a supply of coffins on hand, and when any of his relatives or friends called upon him and stayed all night, he insisted on each having a coffin under his or her bed. His servants, when he could keep them, were retained on the same stipulation. His cats and dogs were put in coffins when they died, and on one occasion he house so long that the stench was intoler- | nally. able. The authorities interfered and compelled him to bury them. He exhumed the remains of his mother, put them in a box and kept them in his wagon house until he was compelled to reinter them. At times he was very devout, and it was no uncommon thing for him to suddenly stop praying and curse vigorously.

> The Fees and Salaries Bill, [Communicated.]

Under the above caption you furnished, editorially, a very logical article a few days ago in the Sentinel that ought to be considered by the Legislature. It is morally impossible for a legislative body in session, especially as most of the members are wholly unacquainted with the duties and responsibilities of county officers and the value of the service rendered, to adopt a correct and equitable fee bill for county, or even State officers. Some years ago I was quite familiar with the duties and fees of Clerk and Sheriff, when the fees were from one-third to double what they now are, as I observe from an experhaps-there have been many changes amination of the law upon the subject. You suggest that if any legislation be necessary that it be confined to reconciling inequalities of the present law. The propriety of this will be observed in the first case of many that occurred to my mind upon looking over the present fee bill, in the case of the Sheriff, whose fee is twenty cents for committai of a prisoner and twenty cents for opening the door and letting him out when his time expires. A much more equitable law would be $1 for taking him. and nothing for letting him out. Let us see how it is. I have known cases almost without number, vagabonds, tramps and others, of all shades of color and sex, brought to 'jail for commitment, filthy beyond description, ragged, diseased, covered with vermin, sick from drunkenness, vice and debauchery, that necessitated at once scrubbing and washing of person and clothing that a person could scarcely by bired sometimes to perform the disgusting duty for $5, and for this service the Sheriff gets the sabulous sam of twenty cents, and no more, for the law does not a low the County Commissioners to make an extra allowance even if the prisoner develops a case of small-pox or other loathsome or infectious disease. He does get however the remarkably liberal sum of forty cents a day for board, which formerly, when provisions were cheap compared with present prices, he received from fifty to seventy-five cents, the price now paid in most of the towns and cities of the country for boarding city and corporation prisoners. I have not described the worst cases that the Sheriff has to deal with; common decency forbids it. The same inequalities run through the clerk and Sheriff's departments, and I am told is equally so in regard to all the other county as well as State offices, but of that I am not sufficiently familiar.

A remedy has been suggested in the appointment of a commission, and I think it a good one. I understand a bill has been submitted in each House for the Governor to appoint three competent persons for the purpose of preparing and adjusting a proper fee bill applicable to all county and State officials, and report the same at the next session of the Legislature. Thirty or sixty days before the meeting of that body would be sufficient time to perfect a very satisfactory fee bill, which would cost the State but little, that would undoubtedly pass, doing justice to the officers as well as the State, and at the same time save much time in legislation as well as unjust criticism in regard to the acts of certain members, for political or other reasons. JUSTICE TO ALL. President Cleveland's Policy.

St. Paul Pioneer-Press. On Friday night two leading Minnesota stant demand and satisfactory to all, Democrats visited the President. He took them all over the White House, showed them the cellars, the kitchen, the conservatory, the east room, red room, blue room, the executive offices, and finally took them to his bed room. Drawing out a box of cigars he passed them, and 000 the same day his house burned down. It then pulled off his coat and lopped down on is not known how he happened to have so the bed. "Now, I suppose we are going to talk politics," said he. The Minnesotians admitted that such might be the case. "Well, what do you want, any way?" said the Chief Magistrate. The Minnesotians giving a polite but evasive answer, the President took the conversation into his own control and went on: "I believe," said be "in civil service reform. I believe the Demosratic party should support me, if I should commit my administration to that policy. The situation for Democrats is a choice betion than any of the same class we sell. tween rushing in and taking all the patronage now as soon as they can get it, and waiting and gradually filling the offices as they become vacant by natural and due course of time and circumstances. If we pursue the former course we may be elected out of power in 1888. If we take the latter, we will give the country not only a good, business-like administration, but deserve to be retained in power. I say this for the party, not for my-self. Now, I think I shall practice civil service reform, pure and simple, and with that determination, I want my Democratic friends to help me by standing between the administration and office seekers, to keep them off as far as possible. That is the sum and substance of my policy. What do you think of it?" The two Minnesota Democrats assured the President of their most cordial co-operation, and some time later departed.
